

A

REVIEW OF THE STATE OF THE BRITISH NATION.

Thursday, August 7. 1707.

AN equivalent for Toulon is the present Subject—And I started a very odd one in the last Paper, viz. the Conquest of Portugal—Nor do I name Portugal, in respect to the High Flying Letter lately sent me, which talk'd in the French bluster of the King of Portugal running to Rome for shelter; I gave no such heed to these sort of People; but when I read in the Publick Accounts, that the Duke of Orleans has Detach'd 10 French Battalions to join the Duke D'Offena on the Frontiers of Portugal, and that 6000 French more from the side of Navarre, are on their march the same way; I must own, I cannot but see too much probability of Success on that side, and if once they push heartily into Portugal, while the Portuguese Army is so weak, who can but apprehend the Consequence of such an Enterprize?

But I shall wave any farther Discourse on this Head; I doubt not but the Government is apprehensive enough of this, and sensible of its Consequences, and in Conjunction with the Allies, will take effectual care to supply the King of Portugal with Forces to resist a Power, which without that assistance, must oppress him but too easily.

I come now to another Equivalent to set against Toulon, and which, if the French should effect, would go a great way to Balance such a Loss, and which is worse, oblige the Victor to Face about again, and remove the Seat of the War again into Lombardy—And this is the Progress of the French Arms on the Rhine—I own the Germans are gathering together on the Rhine, and at last tho' late they seem to promise a Force to look the French Army in the Face; but we see the French have yet such contemptible ble thoughts of their Reinforcements, tho' by our Accounts they amount to 1:000 Men, that they perfectly surround them, Ravage the Richest Provinces of the Empire before their Faces.

If now on this Success, the French, who, as I have already observ'd, encrease their Troops, as well as harass the Enemies, should when joyn'd by the Detachment from Flanders, make a Detachment of 15000 Men to Bavaria, and stand on the Defensive with the rest on the Rhine; who shall answer for the Inhabitants of that Country, whose willingness to revolt has but been too evident? — And who, should their own Prince show his Face among them again, might soon make such a Body up 40000 Men; what force the Emperor has there to relift such an Attempt, and what the Consequences of it might in all rational probable Conjecture be, I shall next enquire; in which Enquiry may easily be observ'd, what a Risque the whole Confederacy have run, in the supine negligence of the Imperial Affairs, and to what probable Mischiefs the whole Affair has been expos'd; and this is my Principal Design in this Enquiry.

First, I am to enquire whether it be probable, the French may spare such a Detachment, and in answer to this, I must observe; that by the best Calculation I can make, the German Army, when all the Quota's that are expected are come up, cannot make above 40000 Men to appear in the Field, the Garrisons of Landau, Phillipsburg, Mentz, and other Cities excepted, which cannot take up less than 20000 Men.

The French, by the most moderate Accounts we have yet seen, were 35000 Men, besides the Detachment made from the Garrisons which joyn'd them since — And we cannot imagine, but with that Detachment, and the Men they have pick'd up in the Countries they have Ravag'd, they have added 10000 Men to that number; out of these it cannot be difficult to join 7000 Men to the Bavarians, who are marching from Flanders, who we are told will by Detachments from the Moselle be 8000 Men; these, together with the Duke of Bavaria at the Head of them, with a swift and resolute March, and a Motion of the French Army to favour them, may but with too much ease, and too little Opposition, traverse the Circle of Swabia, and enter Bavaria at once.

Nor will any Man say, but the appearance of the Duke of Bavaria, among his own Subjects at this time, would be as good as 20000 Men, if he have but a supply of Arms and Ammunition, to put them in a Posture of showing their Affection to him, and revenging the Cruelties of their Enemies.

I could descend to a great many Particulars here, and show how unable the Imperial Army on the Rhine would be to follow them, and how every General must spend time, to have Orders from their respective Principals, to admit their Troops to serve on the Danube; how they are destitute of Magazines for such an Undertaking, and how the delays of their concerting those things, would most effectually give the Enterprise of the French, abundant leisure to take effect.

I come now to the Consequence, which the Bavarian recovering his Country, must have upon the Affairs of the Empire — And in this I shall not talk in Gross, nor make wild Conjectures, but leave all Men to Judge for me.

First, The Emperor as he was before will be Insulted, even in his Imperial City, and they that dispute this, may do well to look back to the time, when the Duke of Bavaria having taken Passau, laid all the Country under Contribution to the Gates of Linz, and almost to the Districts of Vienna.

Secondly, By the Tyrolese, the Bavarian may break into Italy, either into the Milaneze or the Mantuan, and unravel all the Conquests of the Duke of the Duke of Savoy; in either of which Cases, the Imperial Forces would be oblig'd to face about, and quitting their Projects of new Conquests, take care to defend the very Person of their Master the Emperor.

I know there are remote Conjectures, and I have the satisfaction to see that the Project of Toulon seems so well concerted, so near at Hand, and so heartily push'd, that the French may not have time to make any of these Attempts; and really, in my weak Judgment, it is upon the priority of this Expedition, that all the Success cess of this Affair seems to depend.

'Tis certain, neither the King of Portugal nor the Emperor can defend themselves against but 20000 Men that should attack them in the Condition they are now reduced to, and all their safety depends upon the French not being able to spare 20000 Men to Attack them, which in my Opinion is but a very indifferent Security for any Prince to depend-upon.

To such a precarious and uncertain Condition has the Emperor reduc'd himself at the same time, that he is Invading Kingdoms in other Places; and if in this weakness of his Affairs, he is attack'd in the very middle of his Victories, he may fall a Victim for ought we see to a very inconsiderable force; but let him look to that, if he can make this one Attempt upon Thoulon first, and give France this humbling Blow — Let him shift for himself after, I see but few on this side the World would care either to pity or help him.

To what Hazards, to what Exigencies, and Distresses, do the Princes and Great Men of this World run themselves by their Pride, Ambition, and covetous Excesses? To Day Invading Kingdoms, to morrow in Distress to defend their own; to Day Dispossessing lesser Princes, by their extended and Illegal Power, and to morrow in Danger of being Dispossess'd themselves by the same Arbitrary and unreasonable Violence.

How might we run a Parallel here, between these too Great and Ambitious Families, the Houses of Austria and of Bourbon, who have alternately fill'd the Christian World with all sorts of Violence, Civil and Ecclesiastical; what Seas of Blood have they spilt in the Prosecution of their various Designs, and their visible Attempts to finish the Bondage of Europe, and reduce the rest of the Sovereigns of Christendom to their Obedience?

It would be too long here, to look back to the House of Austria in its Meridian Grandeur; when Charles V. went a much greater length, than ever Lewis XIV. has done, towards what we call an Universal Monarchy; when he posses'd at once, the Empires of Germany, Mexico and Peru; the Kingdoms of Spain, Hungary, Bohemia, Na- ples, Sicily, and Sardinia, the Dutchies of Milan and Burgundy, all the Spanish Netherlands, all the United Provinces — And all those Kingdoms and vast Tracts in America, we now call the Spanish West-Indies, with the Kingdom of Tunis, and all the Coast of Afrie on the Mediterranean Sea — Had at the same time, the King of England his Ally and Confederate, the King of France, and one of the Electors of the Empire his Prisoners; he had the most Powerful Armies, and the best Soldiers in the World — He fac'd the Great Turk, Soliman the Magnificent, with an Army of 60000 Horse and Dragoons, and 120000 Foot all old Disciplin'd Troops, ready and eager to have Engag'd the Turks, who had then 400000 Men in his Army, but durst not Fight him.

How have we seen this formidable House reduc'd! on his Death it was reduc'd into two Monarchies, Philip of Spain the Son to the Emperor, gets all Spain, America, Italy, and the Low Countries; Rodolph his Brother gets the Empire, all the Hereditary Countries and the Kingdom of Hungary.

In a few Ages from this, how do we find it all torn to pieces, by the private Divisions of the several Countries, and the just Reassumption of their injur'd Neighbours? The Spanish Monarchy suffer'd the Defection of the Dutch, and by a bloody War of 40 Years continuance, and the Expence of 380 Millions, sets down Impoverish'd, Maim'd, and Dislocated, and has from that time miserably declin'd in Force, and dwindled away into all manner of Deficiencies and Impotence, both in Arms and Politicks, till they are become the Contempt of the World, as it is this Day.

The Emperor of Germany, carrying on his Tyranny to the heighth of Oppression and Persecution, suffers the Eruption of the Swedes, under the Great Gustavus Adolphus, who, joyn'd with the Oppres'd Protestants, have had their turn in hoking his Usurp'd Authority, and having in two Years and three quarters pierc'd three fourths of the Empire, had the Honour to Establish the Protestant Religion in Germany, and restore the Liberties of all the Empire in the famous Treaty of Munster.

Ever since these two Blows, the House of Austria
